season, which means that the Golden Globes awards broadcast arrived on Sunday night, an extravaganza that not only helped keep the New Year celebration going, it also showed us just how much diversity there was in the years' best motion picture and broadcast entertainment.

"La La Land" won a record seven awards, including for best picture comedy or musical. In doing so, it broke the record shared by two 1970s movies, "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest" and "Midnight Express," both of which won six Globes, including wins in a category — acting debut — that no longer exists. It was a dominant night for this evocative film about the love affair between a would-be movie star and a tough, sardonic jazz musician, taking home awards for best film and acting awards for Emma Stone and Ryan Gosling in the musical/comedy category, along with best director, screenplay, score and song, capturing the collective momentum in a way that usually translates into Academy Award success.

Jimmy Fallon

Host Jimmy Fallon opened the evening with a "La La Land"-inspired musical tribute of sorts that demonstrated just how well entrenched Damien Chazelle's musical has entered the pop culture consciousness. Fallon sang numbers based on two songs from the movie — "Another Day of Sun" and "City of Stars" — and parodied the movie's Griffith Observatory dream sequence, waltzing and floating with Justin Timberlake and a backdrop of stars.

It was a bubbly start to what was to become a celebration of the best Hollywood has to offer, that, along with some political commentary by Meryl Streep, gave the broadcast a big jump in viewership, up 8% from the previous broadcast. In all, the Golden Globes attracted some 20 million viewers, a positive for award show popularity that has seen dips with viewers over the past several years.

"Moonlight," directed by Barry Jenkins, a social drama depicting three periods in the life of a young black man struggling with and ultimately learning to accept his gay identity, took one significant Globe — the evening's last, for best dramatic picture. Jenkins' socially themed film has become a recent part of the cultural conversation provoking discussions about race, sexuality and identity.

Claire Foy and Prince Harry

One of the evening's biggest surprises came when Isabelle Huppert took best actress in a drama for the French film "Elle," beating Natalie Portman, who was favored to win for "Jackie." ("Elle," a thriller about a businesswoman, who tracks her rapist, also won best foreign film.)

Emma Stone Looking Gorgeous at the 2017 Golden Globes

The most controversial segment of the broadcast occurred when it took a political turn as Meryl Streep used her acceptance speech to denounce the president-elect. Mr. Trump responded to the criticism on Twitter a few hours later, adding an interactive political twist.

"Manchester by the Sea," a film that has received a lot of critical acclaim and five nominations managed to win one Globe, for lead actor Casey Affleck, an actor whose career has taken a big leap in recent years, gave a compelling performance as the angry, confused janitor who finds himself becoming guardian to his
